1876 Poster Is Larger Than Life!

New in the Ingersoll Museum for 2019 is an 1876 broadside poster excerpting an Ingersoll speech. Almost six feet tall, it’s one of just two known to survive. And it’s proof that “A Vision of War,” perhaps the best-loved single passage in the Ingersoll repertoire, was recognized as special within days or weeks of its delivery.

On September 21, 1876, Ingersoll addressed tens of thousands of Civil War veterans at Monument Circle in downtown Indianapolis. Much of his lengthy speech was devoted to political bombast, savaging the Democratic Party (“waving the bloody shirt”) and praising G.O.P. candidate Rutherford B. Hayes. But in one 970-word segment, Ingersoll took a different tack, weaving a lyrical, almost cinematic word-picture that captured the Civil War experience for those who fought and live, those who fought and died, and for all those left behind at home.

RECALLING A FORGOTTEN APPRAISAL TOM FLYNN

In S. T. Joshi’s 2008 anthology Icons of Unbelief, I offered a 7,500-word article on Ingersoll in which I sought to counter the partisan “hagiography … common … among Ingersoll biographies.” (A longer version of the article appeared in 2014, anchoring the Inquiry Press anthology Religions Are for a Day. To purchase, see the Marketplace in this newsletter.) It’s a problem both Susan Jacoby and I had remarked on: we know Ingersoll mostly by the writings of avid admirers, which complicates the objective assessment of his impact.

But it may be that I rushed in where someone better-informed would have seen less need to tread. I recently learned that a distinguished scholar took up the challenge of appraising Ingersoll objectively decades before in an obscure 1972 treatise whose existence was previously unknown to me.

Robert Ingersoll by David D. Anderson deserves to be better known among Ingersoll researchers. It was part of Twayne Publishers’ United States Authors series, a sprawling series of short reference titles devoted to American writers and thinkers. (Twayne, once a major publisher of reference works, was bought out by Simon and Schuster sometime during the 1990s and is now a unit of Gale/Cengage Learning.) Anderson was a professor of English at Michigan State University, a 1963–1964 Fulbright Lecturer at the University of Karachi (Pakistan), and a founder of the Society for the Study of Midwestern Literature. He published thirty-seven books, among them Robert Ingersoll.

In the book’s preface, Anderson regretted that “recent studies and editions of [Ingersoll’s] works are either admittedly or obviously partisan.” He proceeded to offer historical and literary analyses of Ingersoll’s legal career and several of his most famous lectures. Anderson concluded that Ingersoll “is deserving of much more than the obscurity to which he has been relegated.”

[Ingersoll’s] importance in the movement toward secularizing America and his role in shifting the direction of man’s thinking from the next world to this one must not be underestimated. He made those contributions with force, vigor, wit, and courage; and he expressed them as eloquently as man could possibly do. Determined to free men from the domination of dogma of the past, he made substantial contributions to that cause—and he did so not for the few of libraries and learned journals but for the many across the nation.

Anderson’s analyses strike me as well-formed with a single exception. Somehow he got the notion that “Ingersoll’s faith in science was not characterized by a belief in a rigidly determined naturalistic universe.” In fact, Ingersoll was a hard determinist. Inspired by the German radical materialist Friedrich Karl Christian Ludwig Büchner (1824–1899), Ingersoll argued repeatedly that determinism, coupled with the then-prevailing belief that the universe was uncreated and eternal, ruled out the very possibility of a creator god. (I spell this out in my article in Joshi’s book and in Religions Are for a Day.)

Color me embarrassed: Some thirty-six years before I set out to address the “objectivity gap” in Ingersoll scholarship, David Anderson had plowed that field way ahead of me. How had I missed it? I ascribe it to two factors: Twayne Publishers’ acquisition and associated passage into relative obscurity and the unfortunate fact that Anderson’s book came out four years too late to be included in Gordon Stein’s 1968 bibliography Ingersoll: A Checklist. In a time when organized freethought was in tatters, Stein’s work had a huge impact; it’s not going too far to say that it established the boundaries of the Ingersoll literature as later workers in the field would come to know it. Including me.

Anderson’s Robert Ingersoll remains worth reading. It’s accessibly brief at 141 pages and readily available on the used book market. (I snagged my copy through Abe Books for about $10.) Check it out!

The haunting extract gained fame so quickly that within weeks it was reproduced in this oversized format, to be read on building walls and inside social halls and taverns. Soon afterward named “A Vision of War,” the extract was republished in numerous forms, from a pamphlet to a lavishly illustrated full-color edition with dazzling watercolor images.

“..."A Vision of War” was considered the foremost literary response to the Civil War, alongside Lincoln’s Gettysburg Address, until the publication of Stephen Crane’s The Red Badge of Courage (1895).

Framed in new wood carved in an 1870s pattern, the poster will be added to the James Hervey Johnson Display Room at the front of the Birthplace. This room already contains the 560-pound sandstone bust of Ingersoll, the museum orientation video, and the pianoforte given by the Ingersoll family on the occasion of the museum’s first restoration in 1921.

The poster itself is exceptionally rare. Broadside posters of this sort were printed on high-acid pulp paper, which decays quickly unless stored under ideal conditions. It has been professionally preserved and framed using museum-grade materials. Gifted to the Ingersoll Museum in 2018 by Saul Dunn and Susan Starr in honor of their brother William J. Dunn, who loved liberty and freethought, the poster was displayed prior to its preservation at the Ingersoll Museum Silver Anniversary Event in Syracuse, New York, this past August.

It is also one of two original broadside posters now displayed at the Museum, the other being a twenty-eight-inch poster promoting an October 11, 1878, Ingersoll lecture at City Hall in Lawrence, Massachusetts. That poster, the gift of Ingersoll aficionado Al Szczepek, joined the Museum collection in 2008.

ENDOWMENT CROSSES HALFWAY MARK!

The Ingersoll Museum endowment fund stands at $201,483.21—up from last year by $18,519.54. That’s past the halfway point toward the fund’s target of $400,000. With an endowment fund of that size, the Museum could meet its routine operating costs from investment income and would no longer require subsidies from the Center for Inquiry.
